This thesis investigates the complexity in physiological time series with application to neonatal sleep electroencephalography (EEG) signals. Complexity analysis is applied to two clinical data sets of neonatal sleep Electroencephalography (EEG) time series, to uncover the evolution of signal dynamics and its relationship to neurodevelopment and maturation. A review of the advantages and disadvantages of various complexity measures is provided and it is determined that nonlinear dynamic analysis is complimentary to the traditional linear methods for EEG signal processing.

Surrogate data analysis is used to test the nonlinearity structure in the signal. The complexity of the neonatal sleep EEG signals were further quantified by evaluating two complexity measures i.e.

Approximate Entropy (ApEn) and

Sample Entropy (SaEn). The suitability of ApEn and SaEn for moderate length data and their relative robustness to noise has made them the good candidate for analyzing EEG time series data. Parameter selection is of utmost importance in the computation of complexity measures, and this was addressed in the thesis by improving the process of determining the appropriate time delay. The time delay determination process was applied to both synthetic and real data; and incorporated into the computation
